Cross straggled home East with the avowed intention of never donning the gloves again. But the call of the game was too strong for him, and two intention for the more remunerative calling of boxing.

He fared successfully in his first few fights upon his return to the ring, and accided to stick to it for all he could get out of it. He cleansed the ilightweight field thoroughly during the next three years. He eliminated many contenders for championship honors, while he himself made no pretensions to the crewn.

Then came the Eastsider's second setback. In September of 1912, Leachie fought so poorly against Jimmy Duffy, of Buffalo, that he was declared the loser for his unfair tactics. The following month he suffered another reversal, Jack Britton being his conqueror. Then followed two great, but losing battles against Jose Rivers. Cross was surely through was the universal opinion.

Then Leachie became vagrant to his vow. He shook the dust of New York and once again tempted fate, as it is tempted on the const. He hiked to Vernon, and convinced the Californians that he was a fighter after all. "Bud" Anderson, a sensational newcomer, was selected as his opponent, and Leachie put the quietus on him in twelve rounds. He then outpointed Matty Baldwin in twenty and whipped Frank Barrieau up in Vancouver.
